NO. 30 外国語を学ぶ際に必要なもの(2)

Learning a new language implies entering a new world, and it inevitably leads to a widening of intellectual experience. Learning a new language well enough to be able to understand it when heard, to speak it, read it, and write it, is such hard training that we certainly need some strong urge to drive us on. The four distinct and separable activities just mentioned - listening, speaking, reading, and writing - call for constant, preferably daily, exercise. These activities are concerned in varying degrees with four aspects of language study - pronunciation, grammar, vocabulary, and "idiom. It is useful to keep these four activities and four aspects clearly in mind.

Learning a new language calls for no great originality of mind or critical talent, but it does demand an eager intellectual curiosity and a constant and lively interest in the endless ways in which human ideas may be expressed. It demands quick observation first of all, reasonable ability to mimic and imitate, good powers of association and *generalization, and a good memory.
