NO.56 ビタミンＡの重要性とサツマイモ(2)

Anne Herforth, an expert on global food security and nutrition, calls supplements a short-term solution to a more fundamental problem, which is people not having access to high-quality diets."

Mr. de Brauw says the potatoes had a surprising effect on the health of children. At the end of the three-year study, the researchers compared the health of children in villages growing orange sweet potatoes with those not growing them.

Children living in the sweet potato villages had 40% fewer cases of *diarrhea than other boys and girls. Among children under the age of three, the difference was 50%. According to Mr. de Brauw showing the effect of a food-growing project on health is very important, or as he says, "a big deal!"

"This is a big deal because nobody has shown in the past that an agricultural production intervention can have big health impacts... any health impacts."

Experts say that teaching farmers how to grow healthier food is one of the best ways to improve health. Ms. Herforth says the findings do a good job making the link between food production and health. It's important to show that if "you produce a food and it's available to people to eat and they like it, then it does good things for health."

HarvestPlus is now helping farmers in other countries. In India, the group is helping farmers grow iron-rich millet. And in Bangladesh, it is helping farmers grow high-*zinc rice.
