NO.45 個人主義と協調主義

In 1983, the Nobel Prize-winning economist Wassily Leontief highlighted the debate through a clever comparison of humans and horses. For many decades, horse labor appeared unaffected by technological change. Even as railroads replaced the *stagecoach and the *Conestoga wagon, the U.S. horse population grew seemingly without end. The animals were vital not only on farms but also in the country's rapidly growing urban centers. But then, with the introduction and spread of the powerful and efficient engine, the trend was rapidly reversed. As engines found their way into automobiles in the city and tractors in the countryside, horses became largely irrelevant. Then, the question is whether a similar outcome is possible for human labor. Are autonomous machines and supercomputers indicating a coming wave of technological progress that will finally sweep humans out of the economy? For Leontief, the answer was yes. However, he missed a number of important points. Humans, fortunately, are not horses and remain an important part of the economy
