NO.47 テクノロジーは人間の職を奪うのか(2)

Alfred Marshall, a British economist, in his foundational 1890 book, Principles of Economics, said, "Human wants and desires are countless in number and very various in kind." Ever since Marshall, people have linked unlimited wants to full employment. After all, who else but workers will be able to fulfill all those wants and desires? We humans are a deeply social species, and the desire for human connections carries over to our economic lives. We come together to appreciate human expression or ability when we attend plays and sporting events. Regular customers often visit particular restaurants, not only because of the food and drink, but because of the hospitality offered. In these cases, human interaction is central to the economic *transaction, not *incidental to it. Humans have economic wants that can be satisfied only by other humans, and that makes us deny that we will go the way of the horse.
