NO.50 群集心理(3)

In the past, following others was a good survival strategy. Suppose that 50,000 years ago, you were travelling in the wild with your hunter-gatherer friends, and suddenly they all fled at the sight of an animal. What would you have done? Would you have remained still, wondering about what you were looking at? Was it a lion, or something that just looked like a lion but was in fact a harmless animal? No, you would have followed your friends. Later on, when you were safe, you could have reflected on what the "lion" had actually been. Those who acted differently from the group did not pass their genes on to the later generations. We are directly descended from those who copied the others' behavior. This pattern is so deeply rooted in us that we still use it today, even when it offers no survival advantage, which is most of the time. Only a few cases come to mind where social proof is of value. For example, if you find yourself hungry in a foreign city and don't know a good restaurant, it makes sense to pick the one that's full of local people. In other words, you copy the local people's behavior.

Comedy and talk shows make use of social proof by inserting sounds of people laughing at key moments, encouraging the audience to laugh along.
